People who work with wildlife: Dev Singh

Dev Singh lives in Sri Lanka. He works for an organisation that protects elephants.

When he was a boy, Dev wasn't interested in train sets or toy cars. He preferred going to the zoo or reading books about animals. He learnt a lot about the animals in Sri Lanka and he saw that some of the animals like the Sri Lankan elephant needed to be protected.

He joined the World Wildlife Fund when he was 14 and he spent his weekends looking after animals. He enjoyed this experience very much and he decided to work with animals when he finished school. Now Dev lives and works in a small village near an area with elephants. He looks after sick elephants and protects them from danger.

Every day, Dev gets up early to check his emails. 'Usually, I have emails about elephants that we're already looking after. But sometimes I get an email about a wild elephant that's sick or in danger.' Then Dev and his team drive into the countryside to find the elephant.

Looking for wild elephants is the most dangerous part of his job – the team have to be very careful when they find one. 'Once I saw an elephant and I thought it was sleeping. But I realised it wasn't asleep when it suddenly got up and chased me!'

Dev works all day looking after the elephants. A lot of the time, he works at his computer, writing reports or entries for his blog. There are also a lot of visitors. Dev shows them the elephants and explains his team's work.

Even after his dinner, his work doesn't stop. He goes out to the fields to take photographs and make notes about them. 'It's a very long day but I enjoy every minute of it. I love being with the elephants and I love my job.'
